

Five for Friday- Overlooked REITs

Shares in REIT stocks have recently fallen on hard times for a few reasons. First, investors fear higher interest and mortgage rates will negatively impact real estate valuations. Second, with a recession pending, the odds of higher vacancy rates and delinquencies are more acute. Lastly, with risk-free U.S. Treasuries recently eclipsing 5%, why buy riskier REITs, many of which have similar yields as Treasury notes?

While the concerns are valid, some REITs are being unjustly sold off with the entire sector as investors focus on reducing exposure to the industry. This week's screen focuses solely on Residential and Healthcare REITs as they are real estate sectors with solid growth prospects and are somewhat recession-proof.

REITs are commonly assessed using Price to FFO (funds from operations) instead of price to earnings or price to cash flow. FFO is the cash generated by the REIT, which factors in depreciation, an essential factor in REIT management.

Screening Criteria

We considered the following factors when screening:

- Residential or Healthcare
- Stock down over 15% from 50-day high
- Dividend Yield > 5%
- P/FFO below the industry average (59.3)
